THE MOTHER'S LAMENT. Twas the brightest morn of Spring-time A leafy morn of May, The lark poured forth, in silvered strain,

Its sweetest, purest lay; The oak had doffed its sombre garb, For one of gayer hue, And the green clad hills were glistening-With coats of pearly hue:

The mother sat with tearful eye, Within her lonely home: She wept for one who slept beneath The cold and silent tomb; She needed not the singing birds,

Her thoughts were in a distant land, With her first, her only boy. My boy, sweet boy, thou wert to me, So beautiful and bright, The gayest beam of sunshine to Thy snowy brow was night;

Thy cheek was like the lily fair,

She reck'd not of their joy,

Thy breath was like the morn. Thy sunny locks were my delight: But now they all are gone. The rosy Spring will come again, With soft and blushing tear, Its perfumed breath will lisp thy name, But thou wilt not be here: The murm ring waters of the brook,

The whisp'ring winds will bring thy shout But thou, my boy, art gone. But now with thee, the pain is o'er, The pain of this world's strife, For still 'tis pain to live on earth. However bright the life. And yet 'tis hard to give thee up, So beautiful so young. Tis hard to have the blossom culled,

Will mock thy tiny tone,

That I have loved so long. I know that thou art flown afar, To distant realms above, And that thy radiant head is gemm'd, With diadems of love; I know that thou art with thy God, And that his love is won, And yet I wish thee back again. My beauteous, bright eyed son.

CLARES Co., June, 1858.
